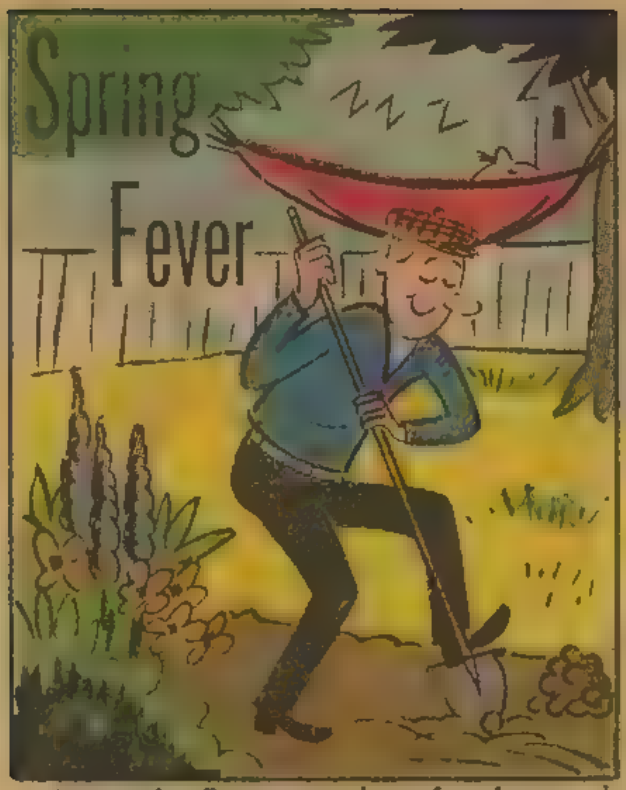
JOHN C. WEBER

(Seal) (My Commission Expires March 30, 1960)



It was the first warm day of spring, and everybody around the neighborhood had spring fever, except Harry Applegate. Mr. Albernathy, who lived next door, had it so bad that he quit planting tulips right in the middle of the job. He got his hammock out of the attic and put it up and took a nice nap.

That was about the time Harry Applegate wandered over. Helpful Harry, everyone called him, because he was always trying to help somebody do something—whether they wanted him to or not.

Now Harry saw Mr. Albernathy sleeping in the hammock and he saw the garden that was half dug up. "Poor Mr. Albernathy," he thought. "He got tired digging. I'll just help him and surprise him when he wakes up."

So Harry took the spading fork and started digging. He quickly found it was easier to dig where Mr Albernathy had already dug once that morning. So instead of turning over new ground, he dug in the exact same place where Mr. Albernathy had been digging.

Every once in a while he dug up a little brown thing about as big as the end of his thumb. "Mr. Albernathy wouldn't want anything like that in his garden," Harry told himself, so whenever he dug one up he carefully picked it out of the dirt and threw it away in the alley. Harry worked very hard. Altogether he dug up about fifty of the "little brown things" and threw them away.

He spaded over the whole garden where Mr. Albernathy had been digging. He felt pretty good about it, and he wanted Mr. Albernathy to feel good too, so he went over and shook the hammock.

"Wake up," he said.

Mr. Albernathy opened one eye and squinted sleepily at Harry.

"It's time to get up," Harry told him.

"Why is it?" Mr. Albernathy asked.

"I spaded your garden for you," Harry said. "Come and see."

Mr. Albernathy groaned and got up and staggered after Harry to the garden. "I don't see where you spaded anything," he said. "I had that much spaded before I went to sleep."

"I spaded it all over for you again," Harry said. "There were some pretty big chunks of dirt in it. I made them littler. Yes, and I cleaned out all those little brown things for you."

"What little brown things?"

Harry saw one on the ground and he picked it up and showed him. "You dug all those up?" Mr. Albernathy demanded in a strange voice.

"Yes," Harry said, proudly.

"Why you nit-wit, you—you little monster! Those 'little brown things' as you call them, are tulip bulbs—"

He made such a noise hollering at Harry, that his wife came to the door.

"What in the world is the matter?" she called.

Mr. Albernathy groaned. "Our little helpful neighbor," he said, controlling himself, "has just dug up the tulip bulbs I spent all morning planting—"

His wife came down and looked at the bulb. She started laughing. She laughed and she laughed. "Did you think those were tulip bulbs?" she asked her husband. "They're onions!"

She turned to Harry. "You're a nice helpful little boy," she said. "If it hadn't been for you, I'd have had a whole flower garden full of onions."
